Laminate Wood Floors

Why choose laminate for my floor?

You are still undecided on what to place on the floor of your home. You want something that will have a different look, but not the kind that borders on the weird. You like the classy appeal of hardwood, but you also want the effects that can be given by vinyl. Plus, you want the luxuriousness that can be reflected by engineered floors. To get a little bit of everything, your best option is to look for the hybrid type, which is known as laminate flooring. At the surface, this type of floor embellishment has two thin sheets of paper that contain melamine. This layer has the photograph of wood grain and is then covered with a transparent layer that can withstand any forces, such as your pets, heavy furniture, high heels and many more. Underneath the picture of wood, there lies a wood chip composite that measures almost half inch.

Because laminate flooring doesn't need to be nailed down, this is also referred to as floating floor.

A weakness of laminate floors is that these floors cannot be sanded or refinished when they become heavily worn, unlike real and solid hardwood. If the material no longer looks good, your only option is to replace such.

Despite this, many people opt for this type because of its tough surface. It has more resistance to dent and scratches than wood. Its tough surface can also be trusted to resist stains, which is why this is easy to maintain and clean. There is no need to apply floor wax on it and you can just vacuum or damp mop to make sure that the floor stays clean.
